

A Note on our Review Process

All essays submitted to the Michigan State Journal of History for consideration are reviewed anonymously, identified only by an identification number assigned to each submission. Each essay is read and reviewed by three undergraduate students that serve on the editorial board. Essays that stand out are identified and sent to professors and graduate students for review. Professors and upper level graduate students review essays within the area of their specialization in order to ensure the factual accuracy of the information presented and the originality of the author's argument. Throughout this process the author's identity remains unknown to those reviewing the essay, including the identity of the faculty evaluators, to ensure the impartiality of our selection process.
